

Interpreting the Quality of Light through Composition and Color

A Three-Day Studio Workshop sponsored by the Arkansas Pastel Society with Charles Peer

Charles Peer describes his vision for the workshop as follows:

I feel my paintings are more successful when I start out with a clear concept and a developed plan for the painting while still leaving room for serendipitous discoveries and new directions to emerge. More often than not my plan leans heavily on interpreting the quality of light through composition and color. The workshop will begin by focusing on techniques to develop such a plan. From that point we will move into the various stages and techniques to bring the idea to fruition. Those attending are encouraged to bring photographs to use as their reference material and I will provide photo references for some of our beginning exercises. Each step will be demonstrated and followed with plenty of time for each artist to develop his own work to that level of completion. As we move through days two and three of the workshop, each participant will work on new pieces with more individual one-on-one instruction and easel time.

My teaching philosophy is this: I have no studio technique secrets and am willing to share any and all knowledge and insight I may have to help you find your artistic “voice” and develop your own gifts and aspirations.
